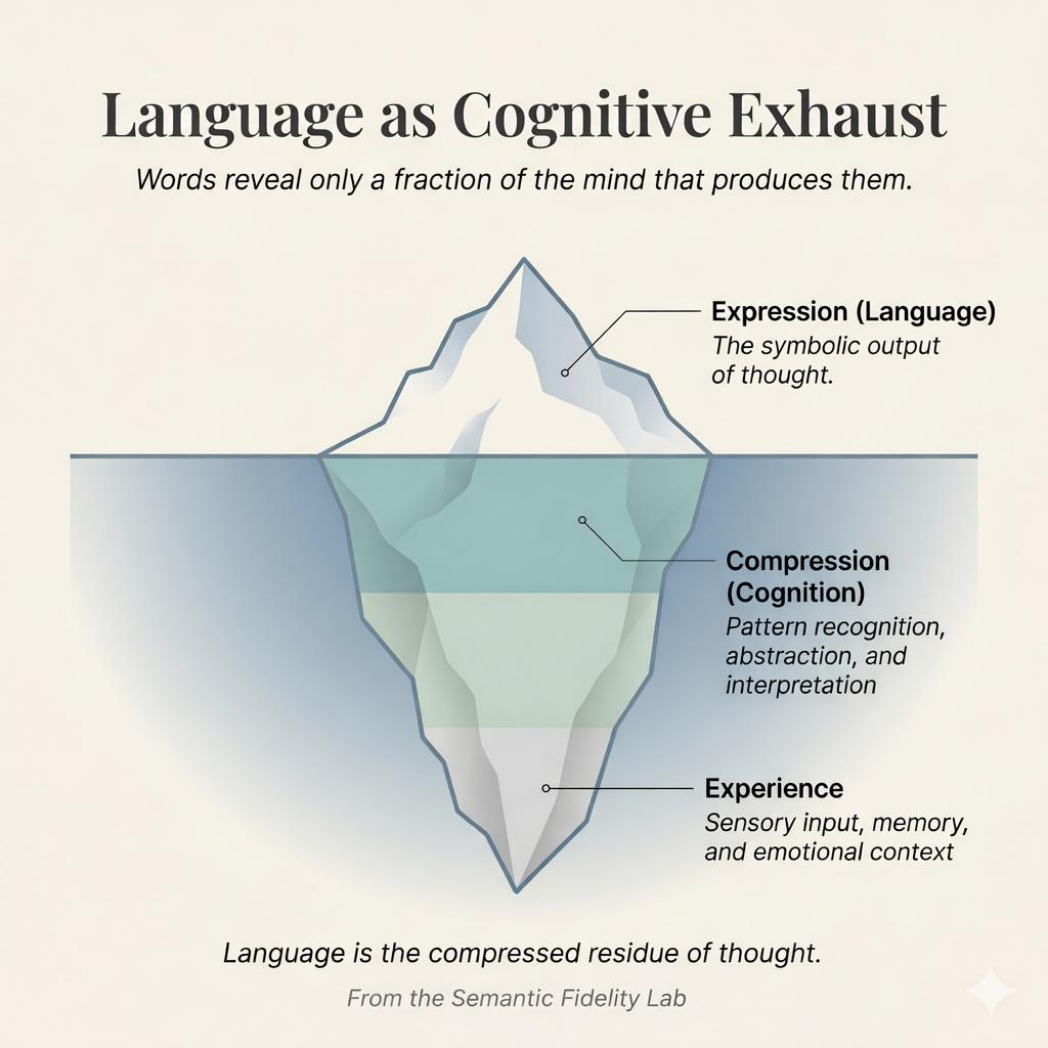
How AI Changes the Way We Think While We Use It



Language feels precise, but it's the thinnest layer of the mind. What we say is not the thought itself, it's the compressed residue after perception, memory, emotion, and pattern recognition have already done their work. By the time an idea reaches words, most of its structure is gone, flattened into something legible but incomplete. This is where semantic drift begins, not as error, but as loss. If we want alignment between humans and AI to mean anything, it has to start here, with preserving the depth behind the words, not just optimizing the surface.

Reference: Semantic Fidelity Lab Substack

Keywords: AI cognition loop, human AI interaction, co cognition AI, thinking with AI, AI feedback loop, language and cognition AI, externalized thinking AI, AI cognitive effects, semantic feedback loop, reality drift